in," ne said, feeding Jack with crumbs in the bollow of his hand, "for it's little enough thou'lt find for thyself in the gutters." Little enough, indeed, anywhere save snow and ice; and Jack may hunt high and Jack may hunt low, and thrust his patient old nose into all sorts of odd corners that seem to have a faint seems of red herring or haddock, but there's little enough of supper he'll get tonight.

all sorts of odd corners that seem to have a faint seem of red herring or haddock, but there's little enough of supper he'll get to-night.

What was it made him so late on this particular windy, frosty, snowy afternoon? Had ine lost himself in a snow-drift? thought Caleb, setting open wide his door and listening in vain for the patter and scramble of the four little feet up the carpetless stairs. Six, seven, eight o'clock came and went, and still no sign of Jack; and Caleb crept to bed at last, shivering and forlorn and with a sense of utter desolt ion and loneliness at his heart which he had never known before.

Frost, snow, sleet, east wind, went on through the night and began again with the cawn. "Nay, but you're not going out, friend?" said a kindly old body, meeting Caleb on the stairs as the old man wearily had slowly was feeling his way down; "There'll not be a soul in the streets with a penny to spare; you'll not get your bread that way to-day."

"It's my Jack I'm going to look for to-day," said the old man, "not my bread; it may be he lost his way in the snow last night and ho's waiting for me now in the old place by the wall. Give me a hand, neighbor, and help me along a bit, will ye?" So the woman helped him along to the wall, through the biting wind and snow, but no sign of Jack when they got there.

"We'll try the baker's shop," said Caleb, thinking of their old haunts, and whether it were possible that the baker's wife, who sometimes threw Jack a broken biscuit, had taken him in out of pity for the night.

And while they were in the shop asking after the dog, there came in two children who had a strange story to tell, astory which froze Caleb's blood in his veins as he stood and listened. They had seen a dog, a dog for all the world as like Jack as could be, being led along the day before by two men who came out of a public-house, and who talked and laughed loudly as they went along. Said one, "It doesn't do to be too tender-hearted in these hard times; human flesh and blood reckons before dog's f reckons before dog's flesh and blood any one in the week." Said the other, "And the doctor will give us a good 'arf-crown for him safe chough and ask no questions into the bargain."

Caleb trembled from head to foot. "Take me to his house," he said in a voice that startled the children, for it vibrated and twanged like any old harpsichord with all the music gone out of it.

At the doctor's door the two children left bim standing on the door-step, they themselves running away and peeping at him round the corner of the street. A man-servant answered Caleb's ring. "My dog!" said the old blind man in the same harsh trembling voice; "what have you done with him? He's white-haired like me, and thin like me; you can count every rib in his body."

Ugh! how cold it was! The east wind and sleet blew in the servant's face, and how cold he be expected to stand there talking with an old blind man on the door-step? He half shut the door. "Your dog, old man!" he said; "we know nothing about dogs here." He would have shut the door in Caleb's face, but the old man was too quick for him, and had put his stick across the threshold. "Mydog!" he repeated, louder and louder; "white-haired, thin like me; you could count every rib he had!"

A gentleman was coming down stairs at this moment. He was dressed in the glossiest of black with the whitest of ties. He had a gleaming smile, a thick square jaw and eyes that changed as you looked at them. "What is it?" he said tranquilly, coming toward the door. "Does the man want money? I do not like a disturbance on my door-step. A dog, did you say—white-baired—thun! Oh yes, I had him with two collevs yesterday afternoon. The brute! he wasn't worth the money I paid for him; he bowled so we had to cut his windpipe before we could do anything with him. I wouldn't have had him if I could have got a third colley; they are so much more quiet and patient. Villain! did you say, old man! No, ''m physic gist—you shouldn't be abusive; the law proi is me, and we must have subjects. There, that'll do," and

and led him home again, Caleb still tenderly carrying Jack with his thin ragged handkerchief spread over the poor torn body.

Hours after, the neighbors wondered why there was not a sound of movement in the old man's room, and went up, fearing he might be ill, and there was he seated on the floor with Jack's body on his knee, and the words of thanksgiving still on his lips, "God, I thank Thee that I have no eyes to see this devil's work!"

Yes, he lives on, this old man, companion-less and alone: the neighbors do what they can for him, and he rarely wants a loar of bread or a cup of tea now. Every evening, as the clock strikes five, he gets up from his rickety chair, open his down and stands listening for the pater and scramble of old Jack's feet upon the carpeness stairs. Silly!

do you say?—he has gone silly! It may be so; I do not know. Often we are wisest when most we are called foolish, and foolish, when we are thought to be most wise. I only know that old Caleb stands daily, blind and silent, at his open door listening for the footsteps that will never return.
